Women's Rights

Below: A veiled women kicks a man in the groin ("If he calls you a horse, kick him! Stop harassing girls and women"). To be called a horse is the equivalent, in English, of being called foxy.

Sexual harassment is a big problem in Egypt. Women are fighting back.

Above: A mural of women heading to battle, by Alaa Awad.

During the Arab Spring, women's rights violations were an important topic of protest.

Awad uses his art to bring media attention to women fighting for their rights.

Protest Art of Martyrs

Below: The martyr Alaa Abdulhady, painted by Omar Picasso. It reads, "He was Alaa Aldulhady."

Depicted here are two young men murdered by the government forces during protests against President Hosni Mubarak.

Above: Karim Ghazam supported the Ahly soccer team, who were all killed for going against Mubarak. He died supporting them. The portrait reads, "Karim Ghazam a good young boy 1992-2012."

Art Confronting the Regime

Below: Non-violent protest art, photographed by Rayna Habib, Tahrir Square, 2012

Above: Non-violent protest art highlighting the Revolution's start on January 25th, 2011

More Art

Right: This Mural honors Egyptians who lost their sight when shot at by police snipers on January 28th.

Left: The revolution in Tahrir Square brought everyone together. This mural reads, "I am a Martyr." It uses Christian religious symbolism with the wings to show rising from the ashes. Christians and Muslims fought together for this revolution.

